Each day God creates individuals..on certain days he goes out of his way to create a work of art so special that within their soul they are truly a child of his very being..Kenny was such a man, such a creation, such a charmer, such a good person that anyone who met him or his best and life long friend felt they were in the presence of something so special they had been gifted by their presence.They are both gone now and sadly the beauty that together they openly and willingly shared with the world they created has now from what we have heard has melted like the metals in his small and humble workshop. Yet without the guidance of his person like so many other families it appears they have forgotten the lessons of his and his friends lives. If shame can be considered a sin then I guess one must understand that the loss of empathy to greed is beyond even that concept.They left this world such a better place yet from within the beauty that they shared with each other and with each stranger they met such as myself there seems to be enough of a void left that even the smallest piece of darkness can squeeze in to cast shadows of evil upon what should have become a celebration of lives in the same vein as Picasso and others gifted as artists, teachers and prophets.I hope one day to hear that the shadows of which I speak find a way to return the light and put together a book for everyone to read and grow from.... Best regards old friends and sleep in peace. Your light will forever shine in my home, no one can blow that candle out..... a stranger, a freind, a person who found you interesting and charming...
